Privacy window films

Compare a subtle neutral tint with a more reflective finish, and plan daytime screening around the light on each side of your windows.

- Neutral non-metallic privacy film
- Reflective privacy film
- Clarity Security mirrored film where glass retention is also part of the brief

Find the right starting point

Privacy film can help make an overlooked room more comfortable without covering the window with a blind during the day. The choice starts with the appearance you want and the conditions around the glass.

Neutral film offers a subtle tinted exterior with a lower internal mirror effect. Reflective film creates a more mirrored appearance. Both need to be considered against the actual lighting: daytime privacy is not a promise of privacy when the room is illuminated after dark.

This guide introduces the available approaches. It is not a technical certificate, a fixed performance promise or a substitute for checking your glazing.

Choose around your project

Privacy window films

What can be seen, and from where?

Describe the view into the room, not just the room itself. A pavement beside the window is different from a neighbouring property across a garden. Photographs from both directions help us understand the concern and consider the finish against the surrounding glazing.

Choose the appearance deliberately

A darker or more reflective look can change the character of an elevation. Tell us whether you want a discreet tint or are happy with a more visible mirrored finish. Ask about suitable samples before deciding, especially when several adjacent panes need a coordinated appearance.

Make room for an evening solution

If privacy is essential at night, include blinds or curtains in the room plan. Window film can complement them during the day. Where safety or glass-fragment retention is also required, ask about the separate Clarity Security range rather than assuming a privacy film provides that function.

Keep these limits in mind

Daytime privacy changes with lighting and viewing conditions.

Privacy film is not automatically a safety or security film.
