Find the right starting point

Safety and security window film is intended to help hold glass fragments together if a treated pane breaks. The right choice depends on the existing glass, its location and the performance your project requires.

Clarity Security is available in clear and mirrored options. The clear finish keeps the appearance relatively unobtrusive; the mirrored option adds a reflective look and conditional daytime privacy. Neither finish should be selected as proof of a particular safety or security rating.

This guide introduces the available approaches. It is not a technical certificate, a fixed performance promise or a substitute for checking your glazing.

Send the requirement with the enquiry

If you have a glazing report, risk assessment or named performance standard, include it from the start. Describe the building, the location of the glass and whether the work concerns doors, windows or internal screens. The aim is to establish the requirement before choosing a finish.

Choose clear or mirrored

Consider whether exterior reflection is appropriate for the building. A mirrored film may help with daytime screening, but that privacy effect still depends on lighting. A clear film is the more straightforward appearance to discuss when privacy is not part of the brief.

Specialist projects need a defined system

For blast-protection enquiries, the assessment must address the glazing, frames, film and installation together. Send the project specification so the relevant system and supporting evidence can be reviewed. General descriptions of security film are not a substitute for those project details.

Keep these limits in mind

Films do not make glazing unbreakable or a property burglarproof.

Compliance or a test classification must be supported for the particular specified arrangement.

Blast-related performance requires specialist assessment and suitable evidence.
