PRODUCT SELECTION / WOOD AND SCREEN

Wood and Screen Vertical Blinds

Abachi vertical slats with screen inserts that create a patterned light-transmitting surface.

Product illustration. The agreed specification and finish determine the supplied product.

Wood and Screen Vertical puts patterned openings into a tall timber slat and fills them with technical fabric. The wood establishes the vertical line, while the inserted screen changes how light passes through the surface.

The range uses 89mm abachi slats. The finish of the wood, the shape of the opening and the screen's colour all contribute to the result. A sample of each material is useful, but a view of the complete design is needed to understand the rhythm across the window.

- Patterned light transmission
- Timber vertical structure
- Side-drawing movement

WOOD AND SCREEN VERTICAL BLINDS

Planning your specification

Options to discuss

- Compatible insert patterns
- Wood and screen combinations
- Track, control and coordinated top detail

Practical points

- Screen areas remain light-transmitting
- Combined construction needs suitable support
- Stack space and rotation clearance are essential

How it works

The slats tilt and move sideways along a track. Their combined construction is heavier and more substantial than many fabric verticals, so the track, controls and fixing surface are assessed for the completed blind. A coordinated wood valance can finish the top.

Choosing the finish and details

Explain whether the design is for glazing or a visual division within a room. We can review the pattern, likely screening effect and parked stack position together. Exact screen compatibility and current production limits are confirmed in the quotation.
