PRODUCT SELECTION / VENETIAN BLINDS

Translucent Slat Venetian Blinds

Light-transmitting slats for spaces where a softer visual screen is more useful than full opacity.

Product illustration. The agreed specification and finish determine the supplied product.

Translucent Slat is designed around light transmission. Its slats create a visual boundary across the glass while allowing a different quality of light through the material than an opaque timber blind. It suits projects where the decorative effect matters as much as the ability to tilt the slats.

The translucent material should not be confused with ordinary glass or solid wood. Its exact composition and available finish are confirmed for the chosen option. A clear or light-transmitting appearance does not automatically provide privacy, particularly when the room is brighter than the area outside.

- A light-transmitting surface
- Adjustable slat angle
- Coordinated decorative trim

How it works

The range is listed in 50mm and 70mm formats and can be combined with coordinated trim. Slat tilt still changes the view and light angle, but transmission through the material remains part of its behaviour. Assess the sample under both daylight and artificial light before deciding.

Choosing the finish and details

Explain what you want people to see through the window from each side. We can then judge whether this range is appropriate or whether an opaque finish is a better fit for the brief. The quotation records the selected material, width and operating arrangement.
